Benesch Transportation & Logistics Partner J. Philip Nester was recently interviewed by The Construction Broadsheet for a Legal Q&A examining how contractors and other businesses can navigate contractual risks arising from tariffs, supply chain disruptions and project delays.

In the interview, Nester discusses key considerations for companies facing increased material costs and transportation delays, including the importance of reviewing contract terms, force majeure provisions and available remedies when delays could result in liquidated damages. He also addresses steps businesses can take to preserve their rights and mitigate potential exposure when circumstances outside their control affect project schedules and performance. The Construction Broadsheet's Legal Q&A coverage emphasizes that rights and remedies in these situations often turn on the specific contract language, including force majeure, notice and claim provisions.
